Historia Brittonum

This appears to place the composition of the chronicle at no later than 892; further evidence is provided by Bishop 's use of a version of the Chronicle in his work Life of King Alfred, known to have been composed in 893. The historian swiftly challenged Mommsen; but it was not until

Historia Brittonum

Written around 520, this is a short genealogical text in the mould of the Biblical.

Anglo

The Historia Brittonum can be dated to about 829. It is clear that records and annals of some kind began to be kept in England at the time of the earliest spread of Christianity, but no such records survive in their original form. Some of these later copies are those that have survived.

Historia Brittonum

Higham, 'Early Latin Sources', in Helen Fulton ed, Blackwell Companion to Arthurian Literature, Oxford 2009 p. A more difficult problem is the question of the date at which a new year began, since the 1925 that the Anglo-Saxon scholar offered a major reconstruction of the Mommsen view, arguing that Nennius in fact first put the whole work into shape in the ninth century. Charles-Edwards argues that these accounts both refer to a single source.

Anglo

The earliest extant manuscript, the Parker Chronicle, was written by a single scribe up to the year 891.

Historia Brittonum

Peter Field in particular has argued for the authenticity of the preface, suggesting that it was left out of many recensions because it was seen as derogatory to British scholarship.

Historia Brittonum

The Battle of Mount Badon is associated with Arthur in several later texts, but not in any that predate the Historia. Six of the manuscripts were printed in an 1861 edition for the by with the text laid out in columns labelled A to F. Geoffrey also includes Aurelius Ambrosius, another figure mentioned in the Historia, as a king in his own right, and also includes other characters such as and Bishop.
