Breaking Down Barriers: Recommendations for Improving Sexual Abuse Reporting Rates in British South Asian Communities

It is informed by ambitious local organizing on housing issues. Both these developments will have a direct impact on the ways in which local authorities and housing associations operate, by making the differential impact of policies and practices on various communities a matter for investigation and action. At the time of publication, the summer of 2001, it is also highly topical because of the publicity which has followed violent incidents in some northern cities which allegedly had a racial dimension.

Many owners, especially those in gentrifying neighborhoods, chose to opt out of subsidy programs, often selling their buildings for a hefty profit. While a broad effort toward decommmodification may help curb some of the worst practices in the real estate industry that link value to race; it will not address discrimination and racial exclusion on its own. Both these developments will have a direct impact on the ways in which local authorities and housing associations operate, by making the differential impact of policies and practices on various communities a matter for investigation and action.
