Japan Has Nuclear 'Bomb in the Basement,' and China Isn't Happy

The Japanese government reiterates this policy on occasion. However, following the tsunami which killed 19,000 people and which triggered the Fukushima nuclear accident which killed no-one in March 2011, public sentiment shifted markedly so that there were widespread public protests calling for nuclear power to be abandoned. This consolidated the LDP position and role in reviving the economy, including restoring power supplies.

Major Japan life insurers shun investing in nuclear weapons

A poll by public broadcaster NHK last December showed two-thirds of respondents believed Japan should join the treaty, while 17% were opposed and the rest undecided. Even if the horror of nuclear detonation may feel like distant history, the risk today is too high. It applied for Sendai 2 in November 2014 and this was approved 12 months later.
