History

Above - The Auditorium of the Olivier Theatre in September 2017 whilst an expectant and packed audience awaits the National Theatre's wonderful production of Stephen Sondheim's 'Follies'. Most of the centre was built in the 1950s and 1960s.

Might it be better to keep the available to look after this, leaving the main article uncluttered? At least Hall had a bank of productions on which to draw when he began the arduous, stage-by-stage process of occupying the still-incomplete Lasdun-designed National theatre in the spring of 1976. These auditoria, as well as the building and its approaches, were exhibited yesterday in the shape of fully detailed models when the architect's adaptation of his earlier design to the new site downstream of Waterloo Bridge was made public by Lord Cottesloe, chairman of the South Bank Theatre Board. And those early years at the Old Vic look, in retrospect, like something of a golden age.

Curtain

Suddenly Larry was on trial as were the theatre and the actors.
