Police (Northern Ireland) Bill [Lords]: 10 Feb 2003: House of Commons debates

No one is denying that undercover activities are necessary, and that they will sometimes involve using criminals, but that makes it even more important that their actions are constrained rather than given carte blanche. Why therefore do not the Government have the courage and frankness to tell hon.

Northern Ireland

The noble Lord, Lord Dubs, has had some service in Northern Ireland. I thank the Minister's colleagues in for the reassurances that they have given that these principles represent exactly that, and that they are there to help to guide officers in relation to the way in which they should carry out their functions, rather than to give a ruling on that.

The Troubles

I used 's maiden speech as a basis for my maiden speech in this House. Northern Ireland: A Chronology of the Troubles 1968—1993. However, let us not forget that the Undercover Police Inquiry, in which I represent a number of trade unions, has revealed that professional law enforcement officers have participated, and were directed by superiors to participate, in conduct which was either criminal or morally reprehensible.

Public Information Online (PIO)

That convention does not merely require states to abstain from torturing people. Can the informant keep the money that they make from selling those drugs? I do not need to rehearse the arguments. I fervently hope that the Government have learned the error of their ways.
