A CRITICAL REVIEW OF Patricia Cranton, Professional development as Transformative Learning: A new perspectives for Teachers of Adults

Self-directed learning is one of the major components in transformative learning. Distorted epistemic, sociolinguistic and psychological perspective can influence our self-directed transformative learning process. For example, when students are learning about world religions, teachers can introduce literature and articles that discuss different religions, helping them gain new perspectives and understanding.

Theory

A search was conducted for empirical research articles on the changes higher education faculty make when learning to teach online or when teaching online, specifically searching for changes or transformation in teaching assumptions and beliefs. Refocusing faculty development: The view from an adult learning perspective.

I spread innovative and empowering ideas for personal growth.

A CRITICAL REVIEW OF Patricia Cranton, Professional development as Transformative Learning: A new perspectives for Teachers of Adults

Seventeen empirical studies and 28 conceptual articles or books were chosen for their insights into faculty change. Building on the work of Mezirow, Brookfield, and other contemporary theorists, Patricia Cranton creates a practical approach to educator development, offering strategies that are self-directed, reflective, and transformative.
