The College Housing Survival Guide: On & Off Campus

Participants will see your poll. You need to get that resume in order, deal with student loans, whip those finances into shape, and much more.

The College Housing Survival Guide: On & Off Campus

It was so fun figuring out the gift cards and cash combination to include based on what was around her selected college destination. Now's a good time to reassess your finances and get everything in order. Because these quarters rarely have kitchens, most first-year students are required to have a meal plan alongside their accommodation.

If one person is very focused on their studies and the other tends to be more social, it may be best to find more like-minded roommates to preserve the friendship. The good news is that you have a ton of options when you're straight out of school to make paying back those loans easier. Privacy can be very important to some students, especially after sharing a residence hall room during their first year, but this also means being responsible for all household duties such as cleaning and paying the bills, rather than splitting them with someone else.

That means you need to tailor your resume a bit more than someone with a lot of experience. Getting a place off-campus with friends or acquaintances can be a great first step into adulthood. Getting those debts down is tough when you're fresh out of school, but it's not nearly as hard as it might look at first.

If you're prepping for an interview, record yourself and listen. Use Classroom Time Wisely Nothing is more important than staying focused and at your peak in the classroom. If the majority of your experience is personal, studio, or classroom work, add more of a description than you normally would, explaining the kind of timeline you were working with and why you chose the subject matter.
