Tariffs and Growth in the Late 19th Century

Considering that some of these tariffs have been placed on our allies within NATO, tariffs have the potential to not only upset our own economy, but also damage our national security interests as well. After the Civil War, new industries brought Americans not just new products, but also more spending money and leisure time than any generation had ever had before. Further, this example speaks to the capacity of Article III courts to promote fair dealing in the U.

Bairoch revisited: tariff structure and growth in the late nineteenth century

The paper estimates the correlation between tariffs and economic growth in the late 19th century, in the context of three types of growth equation: unconditional convergence equations; conditional convergence equations; and factor accumulation models. I argue that we should take a laser-focused approach to this problem that does not cause direct collateral damage to the American economy.
