Diogenes

Diogenes is the subject of numerous stories, one of which depicts his behaviour upon being sold into. Dogs in turn seemed to like Diogenes and could often be found sleeping halfnaked in the street surrounded by dozens of stray dogs who were similarly incapable of giving half a shit about what was going on around them. Instead, he believed that human beings are by nature good and virtuous, but that they are corrupted by the artificial social norms, customs, practices, and values which are inculcated into them via the process of socialization.

Diogenes the Cynic didn't give a fuck

The story goes that after being banished from the city of Sinope for defacing a bunch of coins, Diogenes moved to Athens and from that point on willingly opted to live a life of abject poverty. His followers positioned themselves as watchdogs of.

Diogenes the Cynic

The philosopher also slept wherever the fuck he felt like, sometimes lying down in the middle of the street in the middle of the afternoon if he felt like napping. Also known as Diogenes the Cynic. Diogenes disliked this, telling people who called him mad that he simply thought differently to them.

Diogenes

However, when one spends their life avoiding suffering and pain, one needs the most intense pleasures to feel satisfied, and remains oblivious to the infinite pleasures which nature itself has to offer in each moment.

Diogenes the Cynic didn't give a fuck

There is a story that Alexander the Great heard about Diogenes and paid him a visit in Corinth where he was resting in the sunlight.

Diogenes

He did not want to destroy such customs solely for the sake of destroying something. According to legend Alexander approached Diogenes while he was lazily sunning himself in the street and after introducing himself asked him if there was anything he, the mighty Alexander could do for him.

Quotes by Diogenes

He is credited with originating the Cynic way of life, but he himself acknowledges an indebtedness to Antisthenes, by whose numerous writings he was probably influenced. It was by personal example rather than any system of thought that Diogenes conveyed the Cynic.

Diogenes the Cynic

His happiness was solely in his own hands. An ancient Greek philosopher who spent almost his entire life telling everyone he met to suck the majority of his freely hanging dong.
