There were also a number of domestic ceremonies that inspired religious sanctity to the various events in the life of a family, such as birth, marriage, funeral, ancestor-worship, house-building, cattle-feeding, and farming. In these domestic varieties of the sacrificial cult, the gñapati himself generally officiated as the priest, though he could call in a regular purohita if he felt the need of help. The Viet Cong used to put rice in hoses, fill them with water and seal them up for emergency food supplies. They point to the Christian missionary commitment of early sankritists like Friedrich Max Müller, John Muir and Sir M.
