Current Agriculture: The importance of communication in Agricultural Extension Service

With missionary zeal these advisers sought to remake the Latin American militaries and deploy them as surrogates for U. Arias has in recent years expanded his geographical interests and now advocates demilitarization as a developmental policy in all regions of the developing world. There has been an interesting debate on the degree to which military power has been reduced in many countries.

Militarization also led to increased uncertainty, shortened time horizons, and a series of crises that thwarted the planning, implementation, and follow-through of the long-term policies that are necessary for economic development. In the typical empirical study of the relationship between militarization and some component of development, all LDCs in the world are thrown into the sample and results are generated. Comparability of the Latin American Military First, there is a long and enduring historical tradition of Latin American security forces exhibiting an almost spiritual calling to protect the citizens of the Patria from progressive values and to reinforce traditional conservative values Loveman 1993, 1994, 1999; Loveman and Davies 1997; Nunn 1992, 1995.
