Construction as a prototype: the novel approach by Sigurd Lewerentz to using building materials, especially for walls and windows, 1920

Soon after the Woodland Chapel was inaugurated, it became clear that it was too small, so Sigurd Lewerentz was commissioned to design a larger stone chapel in the southern part of Skogskyrkogården. The first section of the volume includes essays on Lewerentz's work by the late Colin St John Wilson and the editors Nicola Flora, Paolo Giardiello and Gennaro Postiglione, plus a text on cemeteries by Lewerentz that is the only known piece of writing by the architect. While civilized and well-groomed English parks mixed with allées on-axis, and informal and formal open areas were features typical of the other competitors, Asplund and Lewerentz evoked a much more primitive imagery.

Among technical issues covered in Construction History are construction materials and components, buildings, infrastructure, building form, construction processes and plant. At its center, there is an oval courtyard where the windows, though vertically oriented like those outside, are longer and arranged in horizontal bands offering plenty of light and air.
