READAPTATION OF MALAY VERNACULAR ARCHITECTURE FOR INDOOR THERMAL COMFORT IN MODERN MASJIDS TOWARDS A SUSTAINABLE DESIGN

Such glosses do not satisfactorily account for the development of the two nineteenth-century colonial-era house forms to be discussed in this essay. Southeast Asian cities, in particular, have grown exponentially over a much shorter timeframe than in the West, or Global North.

Design Flexibility of Growing and Transformable House in Malaysia

Chinese dominance of commerce means that most towns, especially on the west coast of the peninsula, have a central road lined by Chinese shops. Many of these stories sustain a relationship with people who have passed away, whether as a form of comfort or of fear. The typological approach acknowledges that architectural articulation within a type has flexibility with specific, yet abstract rules on space, form, and structure.
