Severely injured major trauma patients usually arrive at the operating room with one of the following airway control devices, namely, an endotracheal tube, a SAD, a cricothyroidotomy, or a tracheotomy, that were done earlier in the field or emergency room.

Respiratory Care Currents

Called collagen crosslinking, the procedure is often performed to stiffen the collagen in the cornea during eye surgery. If the patient arrived at the operating room with an oral endotracheal tube, and prolonged ventilation is expected, the oral tube is to be changed to open tracheostomy.

Additionally, some of these patients may not yet have been cleared of a cervical spine injury, and all are regarded as having a full stomach and having an increased risk of regurgitation and pulmonary aspiration. However, several studies indicate that direct laryngoscopy and intubation are unlikely to cause clinically significant neck movements.

Airway Management of the Patient with Maxillofacial Trauma: Review of the Literature and Suggested Clinical Approach

Neck expandability is relatively low and even a small hemorrhage in the region could result in airway compromise.
