Putting Ofsted's new framework into practice

No curriculum, however good, can be expected to stand unchanged for long. Inspectors will continue to judge whether safeguarding is effective or ineffective. This task cannot be undertaken from the centre alone.

Final early years EIF consultation outcomes

Options may usefully be based on a scheme of subject combinations drawn up by schools, but whatever pattern is adopted, schools should ensure that each individual pupil follows a coherent and balanced educational programme.

Curriculum design under the new Ofsted regime

The Secretaries of State consider, however, that similar overall principles to those set out above for English should be applied: - systematic policies for the development of mathematical competence in pupils of all ages and ability levels; - an organised policy for mathematics across the curriculum, establishing the involvement of most teachers in fostering this development.

Need to know: Ofsted's new inspection framework

The provision made by local education authorities for schools, in terms of buildings and equipment, teaching and other staff, teaching and learning resources and other support services, including teachers' centres and in-service training arrangements, has inevitable consequences for the curriculum that can be offered by the schools.
