Katamari Damacy

Katamari Damacy was one of the recipients of the 2004 in Japan, the first time a video game has won this award. The next day, he spoke to his former boss, Mitsutoshi Ozaki, about the concept, further adding a way to reuse the King and Prince characters he had previously proposed, who also agreed it would make for a great game. However, Namco originally estimated that over 500,000 units would be sold in Japan.

Though sharing the same mechanics, We Love Katamari introduces new gameplay features, such as co-operative play, and new goals, such as collecting the most valuable objects, that would continue through its sequels. Takahashi said that the team was aiming for four key points in developing the game: novelty, ease of understanding, enjoyment, and humor.

Not all levels follow this format; for example, some do not have a timer, and instead require players to do a certain task, such as rolling a snowball to a certain size and putting it on a snowman. The game's plot concerns a diminutive prince on a mission to rebuild the , , and , which were inadvertently destroyed by his father, the King of All Cosmos. The evening he conceived of this idea, he spoke to a friend, one of the game designers in Namco, to see if it made for a good game idea, who agreed it had potential.

The player uses the two on the controller in a manner similar to the classic to control the direction the katamari rolls. Most of the tracks were composed by , and many feature vocals from popular singers, such as from the TV series, and , including Nobue Matsubara and Ado Mizumori. The game also tracks which objects the player has collected at any time, allowing them to review all the various objects within the game.
