Yet it has never been an Oberlin weakness to shut the door of fellowship against those who, attending the college as students, fail for one reason or another to bring away diplomas. Those parts of New York which have been the scene of his labours, are giving, and will long continue to give the most instructive lessons as to the nature of that system of doctrine, and its influence on individual character and religious institutions.

He died at Rossmoor Walnut Creek California on February 13, 1999. Whatever man does, then, in the way of obeying the law—perfect obedience to which constitutes his perfection—he must himself do: it cannot be done for him or in him or through him by another; no other can affect him otherwise than by presenting motives to action to him. Howard knew that his love for learning had come from God.
