The information in this record has been migrated into tDAR from the National Archaeological Database Reports Module NADB-R and updated. Problems and theory; Agriculture in economic development theories; Toward a theory of agricultural development; The agricultural productivity gap among countries; Sources of agricultural productivity differences among countries; Agricultural growth in the United States and Japan; Resource constraints and technical change; Science and progress in agriculture; Can growth be transferred? Each of the following chapters summarizes the evidential base for a different part of the globe. An agriculture must have a suite of plants, or plant domesticates to sustain it.

The Origins of Agriculture: An International Perspective (C. Wesley Cowan)

In the years after World War II, two projects explicitly designed to gather information about early agriculture were fielded: Braidwood's Iraq-Jarmo Project in the Near East from 1948 to 1955 Braidwood and Howe 1960; Braidwood et al. These working groups have made substantial progress toward solving a number of common problems. As will be seen in the chapters that follow, early agriculture is a process preceded by thousands of years of cultural and biological evolution.

There are also some unique forms of Brassicas cabbage. A rice agriculture developed in the lowlands, perhaps centered on the Yangzte River delta area.

The Origins of Agriculture: An International Perspective (C. Wesley Cowan)

In very arid and desert climates, like ancient Egypt or coastal Peru, dried plant parts may last indefinitely. Until relatively recently, most plant remains recovered from archaeological contexts were the results of happenstance.
