Pressure Groups

Pressure groups are vital to the decision-making process. Without them a range of different interest might never be heard. Like political parties they pressure groups put forward policies and seek support for them.

Protective and Promotional Pressure Groups

- There is a distinction between protective and promotional pressure groups.
- The CBI and the TUC are two examples of protective pressure groups, because their main aim is to protect their own interests.
- CBI protect the interests of business
- TUC protects the interests of trade unions
- Greenpeace and Friends of the Earth are two examples of promotional pressure groups, because their main aim is to promote a cause which they believe has been neglected by government.
- The distinction between promotional and protective pressure groups is not always helpful as many groups share the same characteristics.

Insider and Outsider Pressure Groups

- The insider and outsider pressure group is seen as illustrative of how pressure groups are treated by government.
- Outsider groups (those without any direct access to the corridors of power) e.g. ABS, Pensioners Against Council Tax
- Insider groups (those with direct access to the corridors of power) e.g. CBI, TUC, Prison Reform Trust.

Pressure groups

Although anybody has a right to set up a pressure group, not all pressure groups are equal. Indeed, these give an opportunity and a voice to that class of people who remain underprivileged. And just how powerful group pressure can be has been demonstrated experimentally.

A good example of pressure group methods

Business pressure groups have one major advantage over other pressure groups as they have the resources to fund their campaigns, whereas others have to rely on voluntary donations. It is common for states and individual cities to have their own offices in Washington DC to be at the heart of federal decision making so that they can represent their beliefs with speed and effectiveness when the needs arise.
