TRADE UNIONS AND EMPLOYERS ASSOCIATIONS: TRADE UNIONS

The second is to put off for about three years action which one knows in one's heart should be taken now. The effect of the recommendation would be to deprive unofficial strikers of immunity from action for inducing breaches of contract, and expose them to actions for civil conspiracy if they made, and acted on, an agreement to induce or procure a breach of contract. Of course, those arguments are right.

The Third Reading of the Bill was on 9th November and again this definition went entirely unchallenged, except that it was provided that it should not apply to agrarian disputes in Ireland.

Therefore, what has happened is that, although at one level we have had the industry-wide agreement which is supposed to be regulating these difficult matters, real authority has passed to the work place, where it is not accompanied by a correspondingly authoritative and comprehensive agreement. We agree with the Donovan Commission in its diagnosis of the British disease in industrial relations.

The answer as to why all the fuss is to be found in Chapters III and VII of the Report, which give a pungent analysis of the nature and effects of the strikes and other forms of industrial pressure from which industry suffers. After all, its necessity springs from the actions of right hon.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON TRADE UNIONS AND EMPLOYERS' ASSOCIATIONS (REPORT) (Hansard, 16 July 1968)

There is, I think, genuine confusion in legal advice which has been given over a period of years about the technical effect of certain Statute repeals. Demarcation disputes may be substantially reduced if trade unions can make binding agreements between each other, so that instead of a dispute having to be settled by a strike or by the employer having to decide how the work should be allocated, and a strike ensuing against his decision, this matter can be decided by more civilised, modern and sensible means. To enlarge opportunities for promotion and training.

It is as British as anything can be. The Report later adds: The Commission further considers it contrary to the public interest that an employer should stipulate in a contract of employment that an employee should not belong to a trade union, and recommends that any such stipulation should in law be void and of no effect. It is difficult to identify the entrepreneur standing with his foot on the neck of the worker trying to wring the last drop of sweat and the last halfpenny out of him.
