Joe Byrd (Cherokee Nation Principal Chief)

In 2018, PBS made several short documentaries about Wilma Mankiller and her work.

Biography: Wilma Mankiller

The tribal election committee voted to nullify the absentee ballots for the new council membership and Mankiller petitioned the Judicial Appeals Tribunal, which required a recount including the absentee voters.

Her grandmother made her return to Potrero, but after Wilma continued to run away, her parents decided to let her live on the farm for a year. On May 21, 1997, Byrd shut off power and utilities to the Cherokee Nation Justice Complex, fired the Justices, and ordered his security forces to board up the Courthouse. The Cherokee Nation petitioned the Federal Courts for BIA officers to confiscate the weapons of Byrd's security force.

Justice Birdwell also issued a standing order which stated any subsequent firings by Byrd would be considered contempt of court and obstruction of justice. The Mankiller Foundation, named in her honor, which focuses on educational, community and economic development projects, was involved in the production. She brought economic development, education, and housing opportunities to her nation.
