Workers In Vale's Sudbury Mines Are Right To Strike

Too bold a move, in pricing, diversification or contract negotiation, and the US department of Justice trust-busters are once again breathing down its neck, as happened in 1928, 1946 and 1975.

In September a pay increase was set by the company within the allotted 5% designated by the government and was wholeheartedly rejected by the workers.

Caught short of stockpiles, it lost a big chunk of market share. This money was distributed to the members affected by the claims, over 12,000 actors in all. The government explained that because the Allies were buying their nickel war material from the US, stopping the nickel shipments to American refineries would have hurt the Allies as much as the Germans.

One of the most controversial issues occurred when Vale fired 9 workers for various offences, ranging from alleged property damage to threats involving picket line activity, and assault. Meanwhile, reports of violence and threats from both sides are serving to make things increasingly tense on the picket line, with the two sides blaming each other for the absence of negotiations.

The executives were Scots-Canadian and American; the workers were French, Italian, Fimmish, Ukrainian, Polish and poor WASP. Chester Migden says he perceived a change in the attitude of management--previous negotiations had been discussions among industry professionals; this one looked more like the beginning of a civil war. It would have been even more difficult to divide the memberships of AFTRA and SAG against each other; many actors are members of both unions.

But we sure as hell had a clear idea that we wanted to diversify our economic base. This was one of the longest university faculty strikes in Canadian history as they did not return to work until 85 days later on January 29, 2009, when the provincial parliament legislated the union back to work with the.
