Simultaneously, Maddox taught Decimus architectural draughtsmanship, including the details of the five orders. The want of proportion in the proposed surmount, compared with the columns and other details of the architecture, would show that they had been designed by different hands, and without reference for each other.

John Nash (architect)

Soon afterwards it was decided that the rest of the church was in such a poor state that it too should be completely rebuilt. During 1882, traffic congestion at Hyde Park Corner motivated advocacy for Burton's triumphal arch to be moved to the top of Constitution Hill to create space for traffic. The hallmark of the Burton design is the large semi-circular bay that divided the principal elevation, and which extended for two storeys.

St Clement Danes Church (The Diary of Samuel Pepys)

Most were representational of the medieval style although it was made clear at the time that the new encaustic tile floors were a contemporary addition to an older church, and not necessarily a cosmetic lie. The finest of the dozen that Nash designed as picturesque castles include the relatively small Devon 1800—04, begun 1807 only finally completed in 1846, was one of the largest houses by Nash, in Cornwall 1808—10, , County Tipperary 1818—1819 was the last of these castles to be built. Career Central London Parks During the second half of the 1820s, the Commissioners of Woods and Forests and the King resolved that Hyde Park, and the area around it, must be renovated to the extent of the splendor of rival European capital cities, and that the essence of the new arrangement would be a triumphal approach to Buckingham Palace, which had been recently completed.

Decimus Burton (1800

Burton's development of the Calverley Estate contained elements of the neoclassical-, the Old English-, and the neogothic styles, and was highly commended: it has been described as 'a landmark in English domestic architecture' and the 'prototype garden suburb'.
