Bibliographical methods are fundamental to the work of the historian of the book, and the appropriate training is a prerequisite to any further analysis or interpretation. Bibliographers are often concerned with the individual book as an integral artifact and how it differs from other books of the same name, often of the same edition, state, or, in the case of imprints, issue. For example, current studies have become much more interdisciplinary, utilizing various lines of investigation in order to gain a fuller picture of the past plant economies.
