Cable television in the United States

To fulfill its license conditions as an educational station, it broadcasts educational and children's programming during the hours, while airing entertainment programming favoured by advertisers and viewers in prime time. Beginning in 1966, the Canadian National Film Board sponsored documentaries in which citizens voiced their opinions about social and economic issues. Therefore, if the local commercial television station elects , the cable system must obtain that station's consent prior to carrying or transmitting its signal.

TELEVISION

The cable operator, saddled with a debt service that dwarfed cash flow, had no money to give them.

Cable Television

During the 1960s they were introduced in many large metropolitan areas where local television reception is degraded by the reflection of signals from tall buildings.

Public Access Television

The legislative history of the 1992 amendments expresses concern that some cable operators may have established unreasonable terms or may have had financial incentives to refuse to lease channel capacity to potential leased access users based on anticompetitive motives, especially if the operator had a financial interest in the programming services it carried. The result was an entirely different sort of programming, reflecting the interests of groups and individuals usually excluded from mainstream television.
