Identification in Burkean rhetoric

Rhetoric is intended to replace division with identification. As nations became increasingly self-governing schooling became more widely accessible, and as schooling became more widely accessible more attention in the rhetorical curriculum seems to have turned to the teaching of critical reception and response. To understand Burke's nature, scope and functions of rhetoric.

Indeed, if one considered the words in themselves, one could not properly discuss the meaning at all; for one must understand the situation to understand the purpose of the statement, and one must understand the purpose of the statement to understand its meaning. In a work that is part biography, part intellectual history, and part rhetorical theory, Wolin analyzes Burke's early essays of the 1920s and all eight of his theoretical volumes and argues that each of these represented a rearticulation and extension of the writer's previous studies, all of which brought together socially and politically charged ideas born of World War I, the Great Depression, and the aesthetic movement of the 1920s and early 1930s.

How, then, can such arrant individualists concoct the world-wide plot? For the featuring of purpose, the corresponding terminology is mysticism. Biological actions are derivative of human animality, acquiring characteristics from human physical processes breathing, eating, et al. Rather, it locates hope in the capacity of human beings to judge wisely and deliberately how they will interact with each other, and in the possibility that they might be taught the advantages of choosing to cooperate rather than to compete when they interact.
