SURVEY OF ICT AND EDUCATION IN AFRICA: Sierra Leone Country Report
Promoting and developing of the School Broadcasting Unit to support the 6-3-3-4 system. Another need for the broadcasting unit is to complement the School Broadcasting Unit. One of the objectives of the new proposed division is to produce and deliver quality educational radio and television programmes to complement and reinforce formal and non-formal education classes.
Infrastructure
National
In Sierra Leone, despite all the difficulties the country faces (e.g., limited stability, lack of a clear ICT strategy), private-sector activities have led to some efforts at developing a robust ICT infrastructure.
Table 3 provides some of the statistics of ICT infrastructure in Sierra Leone. ⁷

Education
All the major tertiary institutions, such as the university and polytechnics, have computer centres for students giving secondary Internet access to staff and students. The University of Sierra Leone has a computer centre providing teaching in basic computer skills to all staff and students. The centre also offers Internet and access to e-mail.
At the school level, there is very little infrastructure in terms of computers and the Internet. The competing education needs means that very little has yet been done in the area of equipping schools with computers and efforts in this area are mainly through the government or NGOs.
Current ICT Initiatives and Projects
