The university researchers concluded in November, after examining the patients and their well water and food, that the disease was not contagious, and that it was caused by a heavy metal, probably from the factory's effluent, in fish consumed by the patients. Leonard Kurland published articles in both the Asahi and Mainichi on December 8 supporting the Kumamoto scientists' conclusion that mercury caused the disease. .

However, the part of the combine which is in Japan is to be broken up. Its Special Committee on Minamata Disease Countermeasures met November 5 and 6 and decided to call for an urgent special session of the assembly. They demanded that the government quickly discover the cause of the disease, pass a strict water-pollution law, and apply the law to the Shiranui Sea.

This first encounter established a pattern for the Minamata Fishing Cooperative and Shin Nitchitsu. Understandably, though, the fish sellers felt that any potential benefits from cooperating with the fishers, rather than distancing themselves from them, would be too long in coming to be worth gambling on. With great deference, he took off the twisted towel tied around his head.
