Implicit in many of the comments was the belief that foreign ownership meant less care for workers, including health and safety and occupational exposures. While demand for nickel began a steady rise in the 1950s, production in the free world was limited to the Canadians and the French with its operations in New Caledonia. Vale and Glencore are large multinationals with diverse holdings around the world.

Nickel

Crowflight is investigating the purchase of various used pieces of equipment to reduce the cost associated with the mill. In this case study, other forces of change at the industrial and global levels have had a greater impact on the reduction of occupational exposures in mining than awareness alone could have achieved.
