West African Change & Continuity Essay

Describe and analyse the cultural, economic, and political impact of Islam on West Africa between 1000 and 1750 C.E. Between 1000 and 1750 C.E. Islam entered West Africa through its trade, many converts were made, and new practices were adopted. Many regions and gender roles remained unchanged. Between 1000 and 1750, Islam caused significant changes in West Africa. In the period of 1000 and 1750, the spread of Islam led to seven Islamic states and empires, and provided new practices to be blended with the traditional African culture. In the period of 1000 and 1750 C.E. Islam increased West African population, which led to more land being required. This led to more conflict, as land spread throughout the rest of Africa. Many aspects of African regions and gender roles remained unchanged, however new practices were blended in with the traditional African culture. African rulers began to issue laws when ruling over populations with diverse faiths and cultures.

Many of these rulers blended their own traditional local practices with those of Islam. This led the people of West Africa to be influenced by both trade and Islam into their culture with West African culture. By 1000 C.E. Bantu cities were governed by vassal kings who had no power over their subjects. These kings were called 'chiefs' or 'heads' of a district, but there usually was no head or chief of a district. Village chiefs resolved distinct issues. The terms 'stability' or 'segmentary societies' are often used to refer to this system of government. In the period of 1000 and 1750 C.E. Islam increased West African population, which led to more land being required. This led to more conflict, as land challenges as population growth, strained land resources, causing conflicts encouraged the formation of Islamic states and empires. Some of these states first built their military and then their governance. The West African kingdoms of the period developed as certain city-states during this time.

The kingdom of Kongo emerged as the most highly centralized Bantu kingdom and an a major center of trade in the region. It was located in the central part of the continent, in the Atlantic Ocean. Its central government was based on a king and officials who administered the nation's judicial, political, and military affairs while provincial governors administered smaller centers and communities for local chiefdoms. The administrative divisions included:
