Lucian Freud On Paper by Richard Calvocoressi, Hardcover

A drawing that reveals a surreal sensibility, as Freud comes of age Flyda and Arvid, 1947 Lucian Freud made this drawing as one of his illustrations for a book written by Princess Marie Bonaparte of Greece and Denmark. For his part, Freud soon decided that Surrealism was too stagey; he preferred reality.

But from the 1950s, it was painting — the challenge of finding painterly equivalents for the things and sensations that most excited him — that had his attention. His manner and his subjects through these years underwent various transformations, each one magically particular. In any case, Freud is not looking at the woman in profile, but out of the picture at the viewer.

In Paula Rego's acknowledged masterpiece Looking Back, the artist offers a profound meditation on the dynamics of family life, realised at a time of her own personal tragedy with her beloved husband, the artist Victor Willing, slowly passing away.

Lucian Freud Works On Paper

Unconventional poses were one of Freud's specialties. His early work had been largely graphic, before he concentrated, from the beginning of the 1950s, on painting.
