INTRODUCTION

It is now nearly a century to declare that global interest in the Arctic has never been greater (cf. the recent books by Hwang et al., 2019; Madsen, 2019). The reasons for such enthusiasm and the ways in which it is expressed are many, but the most important source of knowledge-claims to popular representations of the Arcticpeople (ethnics and cultures) and the environment (natural resources) are the uncertainties of ongoing environmental and geopolitical change coupled with the increasing number of actors who believe that their interests are integral to this assessment (cf. Emerson, 2010). The international Polar Year (IPY) of 2007–2008, for example, demonstrated that the Arctic does not pull its punches (IPCC, 2015). The report states that 'Arctic sea loss and ice decline are well documented' (IPCC, 2015, p. 10; see also ACIA, 2009). Whether the focus is on the state of Arctic sea ice, permafrost and/or arctic animals, the changes in the Arctic are real and they are serious. These are not simply of concern in human and native communities living in the Arctic, but also of concern to billions of people around the world whose declining sea ice, ice sheet melting, thawing permafrost, wildfires and other environmental changes are likely to have significant impacts. The environmental fate of the Arctic speaks directly to global communities in addressing climate change and the need to mitigate greenhouse gas emissions. The Arctic is also the site of rising of the interest in Greenland and Arctic shipping routes as well as the opening up of the Arctic Ocean, as cities such as Shanghai and Mumbai have much to lose. City-states such as Singapore are already responding to these challenges.

As an array of states and non-state parties continue to convert their national and regional interests into Arctic policy, the Arctic is no longer a region defined by lines of latitude such as the Arctic Circle and by biogeographical domains such as the tundra. Instead, the Arctic's continued to attract a range of international actors.
